When within seven miles of Ferges Falls, at a small place named French, the head or baggage sect on broke in two while going up a heavy grade and ten or twelve cars went flying back at a terrific rate. On the rear of the train were three steeping cars occupied by the workmen, over three hundred in number, all of whom were sound asleep and not aware of the impending danger. The cars, which had broken loose, increased their speed as they all approached the second, or cage section, and probably had tim a mile before they struck it. The engineer of the rear section saw the cars approaching, but only had time to stop his train before it struck him. The brakeman on the loose cars tried to put on brakes, but they had difficulty in running from car to car on account of the wagors which invested their reverses.

Had the engineer of the rear section had a moment's more time he could have barked his train and avoided the calamity. But it was too late and the cars struck his engine with tremendous force, throwing three sleepers from the track and amashing them beyond recognition. The result was soon apparent, as more than a hundred men were furtied as more than a hundred men were furned in the debris. The night was dark and like groans of the men were appailing. The people in the rear section at once began the work of removing the victims, five of whom were found dead and many others wounded
